EuroMed: Information and Knowledge Society

Modern societies are shored up by fundamental principles that legitimate every system claiming the appellative of democratic, and pursue to set the conditions for the instauration and stability of a welfare society. These aims are not possible without the referent of the “knowledge society”, which is expected to count with agents of the proper or generated resources. This management must not only meet the profile of the users, but also be assisted by educational policies, which disseminate the resources and promote their rational administration. A political programme of this nature is, at the same time, impossible without recurrent academic-research programmes.

The political, social and cultural space that is described is now understood as “information society”, and it is legitimated by invoking and respecting the above mentioned fundamental principles, among which it is suitable to underline the principle of solidarity. Since the priority purpose of the University, in its condition of a public service, is to echo the demands of the society, we must design programmes of rational exploitation of the resources. This is the double aim of this Master: not only to get students into the considered frame of mind, but also to suggest to them credible ways of usage, to familiarize them with the nowadays inevitable CITs and their utility.
